Looking Back: Growing Up in Middle-America in the 20th Century David Dockery, Ronald Dockery
Looking Back is a great read for those who want to walk down memory lane when lunch was under two dollars, kids played out all day and there were no cell phones or computers. Sports, family dinners, church, school, and the town square where the life-blood of villages in the Midwest and people sang and had fun playing in the park and enjoyed long walks because life moved a little slower. There were only three or four channels on the television if it wasn't fuzzy do to the weather and people wrote letters, not e-mails. Service was kind and the customer was always right and people were, for the most part, kinder and more relaxed. Life was easy in our small town just outside the city.

The Midwest in the 20th Century grew immensely bringing in prosperity and the ability to raise families without some of the disadvantages of the city such as high crime. Growing up in Barrington, Illinois just outside Chicago provided the best of both worlds The co-authors tell what it was like in each one's generation through the use of stories about trusting neighbors, memorable school days and dedicated teachers, life at the center of town where small businesses prospered and the franchise business was not as big. World War II through the Vietnam War eras are talked about along with songs of the eras. Church, Holidays, and touching family moments and some funny ones are sure to make you enjoy this book. It's a book for anyone who grew up in a neighborhood in the 20th century that they look back fondly on, or they are doing research on the history of the Midwest or the 20th Century.
